

Enjoy the Refuge

Salinas River National Wildlife Refuge belongs to the world's most unique network of lands and waters—the National Wildlife Refuge System, set aside specifically for the conservation of fish, wildlife and plants. Nearly 60 percent of the refuges within this System allow hunting of one type or another.

Waterfowl hunting is allowed at Salinas River National Wildlife Refuge according to the regulations outlined in this booklet.

Hunting is a traditional form of wildlife-dependent recreation in the United States and draws thousands of people out to refuges each year.

By purchasing all required licenses and paying federal excise taxes on their gear, hunters provide millions of dollars each year for conservation programs that benefit wildlife and help ensure the future of many wildlife species, both hunted and non-hunted.
