Dummy text. What is less well known to the general public is that almost two-thirds of Jefferson’s original collection of books was destroyed in a disastrous fire on Christmas Eve of 1851. While many of those volumes have subsequently been replaced, there are still hundreds of titles missing.

Another Library bicentennial project is under way to raise the necessary funds and rebuild Jefferson’s library. Through a worldwide search, the Library is making every effort to replace the missing volumes in the same editions as those owned by Jefferson. All the replaced books will be featured in the Jefferson exhibition. At the same time, an admirable effort is under way to digitize the voluminous Jefferson Papers and put them onto the Library’s American Memory web site. While many of those volumes have subsequently been replaced, there are still hundreds of titles missing.

Indeed, the Library of Congress is one of Thomas Jefferson’s principal legacies. The wide range of his interests determined the universal and diverse nature of the Library’s collections and services. Founded in 1800 as the national government prepared to move from Philadelphia to the new capital city, the Library of Congress owned books and maps a year later. While he was president of the United States from, Jefferson took a keen interest in the Library of Congress and its collections, including approving the first law defining the role and functions of the new institution. He personally recommended books for the Library and appointed the first two librarians of Congress, John J. Beckley and Patrick Magruder. After the British army invaded Washington in 1814 and burned the Capitol, including the by nows volume Library of Congress, Jefferson offered to sell his personal library at Monticello to Congress to “re-com- mence” its collection. Anticipating the argument that his library might be too comprehensive, he emphasized that there was “no subject to which a member of Congress might not have occa- sion to refer.”

As threats to these historic sites continue to mount, the park wants to act as quickly as possible to protect them—using federal funds, grants, and any other alternatives available.

Jefferson oversaw the packing of the books, leaving them in their pine bookshelves. Books and shelves were transported to Washington in ten horse-drawn wagons and were received and organized by new Librarian of Congress George Waterston in the temporary Capitol, Blodget’s Hotel. The Library adopted Jefferson’s personal classification system of forty-four categories of knowledge and used it for the remainder of the century. Not only did the library that Jefferson sold to Congress include more than twice the number of volumes that had been destroyed, it further expanded the commitment of the fledgling Library of Congress to a broadly based collection, far beyond the usual scope of a legislative library. Jefferson was a man of encyclopedic interests; his library included works on architecture, the arts, science, literature, and geography.
