Mess Hall: Interpretive Props

The kitchen area of the mess halls

Future planning for the site includes the rehabilitation of the Mess Hall that was returned to the site in the summer of 2011. The structure has been stabilized so that visitors on a ranger-led tour can view the interior. A more permanent stabilization is planned for the future.

Some interpretive props have been purchased for the kitchen area: potato masher; egg beater; cast iron frying skillets (3 sizes); black enamel coffee pot; and a white enamel basin.

We are looking for period pieces such as the ones in the photo above: pots of various sizes; flour sifter, spatulas; laddles; large salt and pepper shakers; serving spoons; and other items typical of a large-scale kitchen operation in the 1940s. We welcome any help in locating objects that can be used in interpreting both the kitchen and serving areas of the mess halls.

Some initial interpretive elements have been introduced. The Western Center for Historic Preservation, based out of Grand Teton National Park, built eight picnic tables based on historic photographs. An original white table like the one in the photo and a second serving table came with the structure and are on exhibit.

Minidoka Irrigator

On September 10, 1942, one month after the camp opened, the first issue of the Minidoka Irrigator appeared. Initially mimeographed twice a week, the Irrigator became a printed newspaper on February 27, 1943. The last issue was printed on July 28, 1945.

The Irrigator, just like other WRA camp newsletters, disseminated WRA rules and regulations plus news about the Hunt community and individuals; events, vital statistics, news from other camps, sports, diagrams of camp layouts, etc. It functioned like a typical community newspaper except that it was subject to editorial interference and overt censorship.

The paper did cover some controversial topics such as the construction of the barbed-wire fence, the electrification of the fence, and the boilermen’s strike. Articles about Gordon Hirabayashi and Min Yasui appeared in 1942 while topics related to the loyalty questionnaire and resettlement became important news items in 1943.

The newspaper staff changed frequently as people joined the military or relocated. Reporters and editors received monthly payments of $12-$19 depending on their job description.

A variety of smaller publications also appeared in the camps: school newsletters; church bulletins; literary periodicals; and high school yearbooks.

Papers at the other nine camps include: Manzanar Free Press (CA); Gila News Courier (AZ); Granada Pioneer (CO); Heart Mountain Sentinel (WY); Jerome Communiqué/Jerome Denson Tribune (AR); Poston Chronicle (AZ); Rohwer Outpost (AR); Topaz Times (UT); and Tulean Dispatch/Tule Lake Newell Star (CA). Assembly Centers also had newspapers during the months they held incarcerated before being sent to the WRA Centers.

Field of Dreams

Build it and they will come....That is our hope as we research the role of baseball and softball at Minidoka War Relocation Center in particular and the incarceration experience in general. Our goal is to rebuild what we think was “Center Field,” one of the 14 ball fields at Minidoka. We want to recreate the field so that games can be played on it during the Pilgrimage or when school and other groups tour the site. It will help us introduce the historic site to people in a very tangible way.

We have found some wonderful information during our research. The Minidoka Irrigator has provided box scores, game highlights, and individual achievements. The Hunt High School 1944 and 1945 Yearbooks have photographs of the High School teams that tended to outscore their opponents.

Hank Fukana and George Nakama have provided some personal information. We have also heard stories of local youth sneaking into camp to play baseball!!

There was a scoreboard, a backstop, and player benches. There is no indication that it was irrigated. In addition to rebuilding the ball field, we plan to clear the amphitheater area where people would watch ball games, plays, and other events.

Part of the project will be the creation of supporting interpretive materials to highlight the importance of baseball and softball during the incarceration experience. These materials will include a wayside exhibit panel overlooking the field; site bulletins; and a plaque listing all donors to the project.

We are also in the process of adding a souvenir Minidoka baseball and softball to our bookstore area.

If you have personal knowledge or images of baseball/softball being played at Minidoka, please get in touch with Carol Ash at 208-933-4125 or carol_ash@nps.gov. We welcome suggestions about this project and will provide updates in future issues.

Book Corner:
Glimpses of a Forever Foreigner – Poems by Lawrence Matsuda with Artwork by Roger Shimomura

When hecklers circle a north Seattle mosque after 9-11
I won’t turn my back
In silence knowing vultures will descend on shuttered stores and homes when hate stains holy walls.

Who will stand on granite mosque stairs
link arms with brown brothers and sisters?

These are the first two stanzas of “Legacy,” one of 38 new poems by Lawrence Matsuda. Roger Shimomura’s colorful paintings reinforce the power of the words in many of the poems and introduce the six parts of the book.

Roger Shimomura was a young boy at Minidoka and Lawrence Matsuda was born there in 1945.
