Bath House, McCormick's Creek, Indiana

This bath house serving an artificial pool is highly practical in arrangement. One attendant centrally located can wait on both men and women customers, who, upon payment of the fee, enter the fenced-in pool area by one-way turnstiles, then re-enter the dressing rooms. Booths serve the women, open dressing space the men. The absence of disinfecting foot bath between dressing rooms and pool will properly be questioned. The architectural feeling of the building is agreeable, although rather more finished than is usual in natural park areas.
