Located in the Petrified Forest District of the Park, near the Long Logs turn-out, Agate House is an eight room linear pueblo situated on a low ridge. As a restored ruin, one room of which has a roof, the pueblo presents a blocky but colorful appearance to the visitor. Chunks and pieces of petrified wood litter the slope surfaces and were used by the native builders to build the structure; the same resources were used in stabilization during 1933-34. A paved trail leads from the Long Logs loop to an opening in the masonry wall so that visitors may view into the restored room.

Agate House was the principle project of an excavation and stabilization program by the Laboratory of Anthropology (now part of the Museum of New Mexico) and the National Park Service during the winter of 1933/34 and directed by C.B. Cosgrove and H.P. Mera, Laboratory staff members. This project yielded limited evidence within the rooms of Agate House but did generate considerable data on other sites within Park lands and included testing three rooms at Puerco Ruin.

For the most part, only the largest room of Agate House, which measured 14.5 x 8.5 feet, contained a variety of cultural items. A few ceramic fragments and ground stone artifacts were found in the other seven rooms but recovered from the main room were bone tools, 15 manos, 4 restorable ceramic bowls, animal and bird bones, a metate in place within a slab bin, a small stone bench, and numerous potsherds. There was little cultural refuse on the slopes outside the walls since natural erosion had transported any trash to lower elevations. The structure was probably used in colder weather since at least two slab-lined hearths were found as well as impressions of roofing construction on clay lumps. Although no actual burials were found, two fragments of human lower jaws were found but no other skeletal materials.

From the ceramic assemblage and stone tools, the inhabitants of Agate House prepared corn or other grain foods and did some hunting. The time of occupation seems to be during the Pueblo II period or sometime between 900 and 1200 AD. About 70% of the pottery fragments found were coiled utility types and the remainder were various black-on-white painted types with only a few black-on-red types. The cultural affiliation of the Agate House people seems to be Anasazi although some of the pottery does have southern origins.

Of interest are numerous unexcavated open sites nearby and the excavated site of NA10808, south of old U.S. 180, about one mile to the southwest from Agate House. This site was an open campsite, exhibiting hearths and scatters of tools on a ground surface, and was excavated by the Museum of Northern Arizona in 1970 prior to construction of a new south entrance road alignment. The site was evaluated to be a Mogollon culture campsite occurred sometime between AD 1150 and 1300. Thus, it is an example of small campsites in the vicinity of Agate House and may relate to the occupation of the larger pueblo site.

For the most part, the excavation and stabilization activities plus natural erosion have removed most of the cultural deposits from the site.

Boundary: An appropriate boundary for the landmark is a nine acre rectangular parcel with the ruin itself as the center of the area.
The local significance of Agate House may be described in terms of several points, as follows:

1. As a pueblo-type structure, it offers a contrast to Puerco Ruin, (which is of somewhat younger date) and to other small pueblo ruins known for the Park localities. It is typical in layout of late Pueblo II period family settlements which were often several rooms, one of which might be larger than the rest.

2. While perhaps typical in layout, room features, placement on a low ridge, and general size, Agate House is of course striking in appearance since the colorful blocks and pieces of agatized petrified wood were used in original and stabilization construction. Throughout the Park, much of the actual room construction was done with locally occurring sandstone slabs and blocks, so Agate House presents an exotic scene to the visitor.

3. Agate House was the first archaeological site within the Park to be excavated for interpretative and scientific purposes. Only very limited digging prior to establishment of the Park and collection of surface materials had been done earlier.

4. Agate House indicates continuing southern contacts and influences during the 10th and 11th Centuries, especially within sites of the Rainbow Forest District. As some of the pottery found was common to the Forestdale and Showlow areas to the south, the Mogollon culture of these areas was an important and continuing influence on the inhabitants of the present-day Park region.

5. Is it agate impaled?
