Agat Invasion Beach is located N the W coast of the island S of Orote Peninsula between Bangi Point and Togcha Beach on USGS Agat Quadrangle Map (1968). It may be reached by driving to Agat Village on Highway 1; the site occupies the beach and areas immediately inland.

Agat Beach is the site of the 1st Provisional Marine Brigade landings on July 21, 1944. It was defended by the Japanese 38th Regiment under the command of Colonel Tsunetaro Suenaga. The 1st Battalion, 38th Regiment, and the 9th Company, 19th Independent Mixed Regiment. The landing beaches, N to S, were Yellow 2, White 1, and White 2. They were located between the southernmost part of Old Agat Village and the Gaan River. The reef at this point goes out about 1000 m making the initial approaches long and hazardous. The beach and the areas behind it were strongly fortified with obstacles such as barbed wire, antiaircraft mines and even buried aerial bombs. On the beach itself, 20 m inland from the high water mark, was an almost continuous line of trenches ca. 0.8 m wide and 1.0 m deep. These trenches were supplemented occasionally by rifle and machine gun pits. Between Agat and Bangi Point were 25 pillboxes constructed of a variety of materials; concrete, palm logs, sand bags, earth, coral rocks. On Gaan Point, two reinforce concrete strongpoints held two 75 mm mountain guns, one 37 mm gun plus positions for machine gunners and riflemen. Also located between Gaan Point and Agat were two concrete emplacements holding 40 mm guns. The Marines encountered highly effective defensive artillery and mortar fire while landing; 24 amtracks were knocked out. Initial resistance was stronger than at the Asan Beachhead, but the Marines overcame the heavy rifle and machine gun fire and entered the ruins of Agat by 1130. Gen. Shepherd came ashore at 1145 and set up his command post in a coconut grove ca. 70 m SE of Gaan Point. The 4th and the 22nd Marine Regiments continued their advance and by nightfall had reached a line which ran from Agat, the foothills of Mt. Alifan, Hill 40, to Bangi Point.

Remains of the Japanese beach defenses still exist. On Gangi Point is a pillbox in good condition; an incomplete concrete gun emplacement is on Bangi Island as well as a concrete machine gun emplacement. On Gaan Point is a reinforced concrete strongpoint; and the remains of concrete and coconut log bunkers and pillboxes are scattered along the beach at Gaan Point. At Apaca Point is the ruins of a pillbox and embrasure. The invading Marines reported coming under heavy fire from a 75 mm gun on Yona Islet; no such gun position has yet been found. Also unlocated are gun positions on Neye Island and the cliffs of Orote Point.

The Asan and Agat invasions were the first time that war had touched Guam extensively since the earlier Chamorro wars. These invasions mark the beginning of the American liberation of the island; July 21st is still a holiday on Guam. They also mark the end of the Japanese occupation of the island. Militarily, the Agat Beachhead was a secondary invasion beach; the Asan beachhead was the most important landing area in the eyes of both the invading Americans and the defending Japanese, however, the Agat landing completed one side of a princer movement which would capture the primary American targets: Apra Harbor and Orote Peninsula with its airfield. As an important example of the heavy fighting that occurred on U.S. territory during this period in America's history.
