Describe the present and original (if known) physical appearance

Physiographic Areas

Llewellyn Park is a planned residental community of 421.792 acres situated on the eastern slope of the Orange Mountain (also known as First Mountain), approximately fifteen miles due west of New York City. The Park is divided into four physiographic areas, the character of each shaped by such natural processes as geology and hydrology into a distinct subdivision. The four acres, as delineated on Map No. 1, are described as follows.

Area 1: The Ramble

The Ramble is a gorge, approximately one mile long, eroded by the Park's principal stream, which runs east. This heavily wooded area with steep slopes was delineated by Llewellyn Haskell as the commonly held greenway because of its rugged and picturesque character. It contains mainly large native trees, predominately of the Oak association - Tulips, Hickory and Hemlock mixed with understory plantings of native Dogwoods, Rhododendron and Azaela. The lower (southeast) portion contains a sandstone cliff where stone for many of the houses in the Park was quarried. The upper part includes the one remaining water body surviving from the original design. The Ramble originally included pedestrian paths and sitting areas. There is now one narrow asphalted vehicular lane running through the lower portion as an extension of Glen Avenue.

Area 2: The Glen

This is the largest of the four areas and the most easily developed because of its gentle topography and relatively open vegetative cover (compare Map No. 1, No. 2 and No. 4), one reason it was used as farmland before Haskell's purchase. It is bounded by the Ramble on the south, the steep Hill on the west and by a stream and Park limits on the north and east. The Glen contains many large specimen trees, Oaks among them, which appear to date from the Park's development and before, as well as a variety of ornamental trees planted on individual properties over the years.

Because is encompasses lands zoned A-1, A-2 and A-3 (see Map No. 5), the Glen includes some of the largest and most historic of the Park's houses (like "Glenmont") as well as some of its most modest, located along the southeastern perimeter. The lands lying outside

Statement of Significance (in one paragraph)

Llewellyn Park, begun in 1853 by businessman Llewellyn Haskell, is the first romantically landscaped planned residential community in the United States. Indebted to English antecedents, its design was influenced directly by Alexander Jackson Davis, architect of a number of houses there, and indirectly, at least, by the writings of Andrew Jackson Downing. Haskell's Park, in turn, influenced the taste of Frederick Law Olmsted and a whole generation of town planners and landscape architects. Its design virtually intact today, Llewellyn Park stands as the chief surviving exponent of how mid-19th century picturesque ideals might be transformed into reality.

Evolution of the Park

The genesis of Llewellyn Park can be traced to 1850 when Llewellyn S. Haskell (1815-1872), a prosperous drug importer with offices in New York City, first met the architect Alexander Jackson Davis (1803-1892). Haskell engaged Davis to design a villa for riverfront property he owned in Belleville, N.J. and the two men became friends, their love for nature a common enthusiasm. Prompted by reasons of health and personal circumstance, Haskell sought property elsewhere for a new home, and in 1852 was introduced by Davis to a picturesque tract of semi-wilderness and farmland on the southeastern slope of Orange Mountain in what is now West Orange.[1]

The beauty of the land and the vistas it commanded inspired both Davis and Haskell to build houses there for themselves. The initial vision of a private country retreat soon expanded, however. Whether prompted by his intense sensitivity to the transcendental qualities of the landscape, by investment potential or by Davis's enthusiasm for a development he might fill with his own designs for cottages and villas, Haskell soon began buying land in large parcels with the express purpose of creating a residential park.

By 1857, Haskell had amassed 350 acres on the slope of the mountain below the 65 acres on Eagle Rock where his own villa rustica, "the Eyrie," and Davis's "Wildmont" were built. A Civil War-era account of the land emphasizes its romantic character (as well as the typically romantic bias of the observer), describing it as an "old tangled and disheveled spot ... a wild tract of mountainous land ... covered with thick woods ... threaded by mountain streams, pierced with picturesque ravines, rimmed and ribbed with rocks, monumented with venerable trees as old as the Pilgrim Fathers, and altogether diversified with a beautiful brokenness of scenery."[2] the Park below the Glen and above Main Street illustrate the striking difference in development density (see Map B). The Glen also includes four of the five post-1913 roads, added to facilitate increased subdivision potential (see "Significance").

Area 3: The Forest

Lying to the south of the Ramble, this heavily wooded area has steeper topography than the Glen (see Map No. 2). It is dominated by Oaks mixed with Tulips, Poplars, Beeches and Maples, and it is zoned predominately A-3 (see Map No. 5). The Forest is subject to a degree of exterior intrusion on its southwest perimeter because of Route 280.

Area 4: The Hill

As Map No. 2 illustrates, the Hill is subject to the steepest gradients in the Park, sloping up to the western boundary. The tree cover is dense, consisting mostly of Oaks and the geology of the Hill is made up of basalt to trap rock. The combination of topographical and geological constraints has made this the least developed part of the Park. In the last few years several new houses have been built on the steep slope directly above Mountain Avenue. This area was reduced in size drastically by the routing of Interstate 280 (see Map B). Since the land taken was sparsely developed historically, few houses were lost, but the top of the Hill was part of what attracted Haskell to the site, so the associative loss was of significance.

General Characteristics

A visitor entering Llewellyn Park on a hot summer day is likely to be struck by an immediate and dramatic drop in temperature. This phenomenon results from the distinct microclimate peculiar to the Park, created by the combination of elements illustrated on Maps 2, 3 and 4. Of these elements, the most apparent is the character of the vegetative cover, one of the dominant natural features of the Park.

Trees found in Llewellyn Park are part of a mixed hardwood forest with Oaks predominant, but also including species of Beech, Hickory, Maple, Pine, Hemlock, etc., all indigenous to the upland Piedmont region. The size and quality of these trees is unsurpassed in Northern New Jersey, and due to the urban sprawl of the northeastern corridor, their equal is not likely to be found in any comparably developed locale. Also of exceptional merit is the Park's collection of rhododendrons.

Introduction of ornamental and exotic species by Haskell and by subsequent private owners has supplemented native stock to produce a noteworthy arboretum environment. Since the Park's plantings were never characterized by monoculture, the loss of Chestnuts and Elms to blight was regrettable but not disastrous.

Topography and hydrology in the Park interact to create obvious surface drainage patterns that contribute to its division into the four distinct areas already described. The main watershed or drainage area is directed to the stream running east through the Ramble. A slight ridge running east-west in the Glen diverts some surface water to the north edge of the property into an existing stream.

Architecture

The parenthetical numbers in the following discussion refer to the map and the individual survey forms, on which the buildings are described more fully. For ease of analysis, the architecture of Llewellyn Park can be divided into four phases, their dates slightly overlapping in some cases:

I	The Romantic Revivals: ca. 1857-1870
II	High Victorian Eclecticism: ca. 1870-1900
III	The Academic Reaction: ca. 1900-1945
IV	Post-War Subdivisions: ca. 1945-present

These categories include generalizations and contradictions, but for the most part, they offer a remarkably clear-cut picture of major trends in American Architecture from the mid-19th century to the middle of the 20th. Phases I and II, with a combined total of only 31 surviving buildings, present fewer examples than one might expect for two reasons: For many years the Park was sparsely developed (the 1873 map depicts fewer than 40 lots with buildings), and many larger houses of the 19th century were demolished for land subdivision or for the construction of marginally smaller houses.

More houses (81) were built in Phase III than in any other. For the most part, the architecture of this period tends to relinquish innovation in favor of a kind of staid propriety sometimes typical of the Academic Reaction as a whole. Phase III houses accurately reflect the image of the Park during these years as a bastion of solid conservative values.

The architecture of Phase IV reflects, for the most part, the reduced size and diminished design quality typical of postwar construction. Most of the 49 houses built in this phase are categorized as "Intrusions."

PHASE I: The three most significant buildings of this period were all designed by A.J. Davis, the circular gate lodge (#71) and "Castlewood" (77), both constructed of uncoursed or random-coursed native fieldstone, and the Nichols Cottage (45), a 3-bay center-gabled wooden house typical of Davis' designs for less affluent clients. All three display the architect's fondness for Gothic inspiration. Another Gothic house (#49) was built ca. 1857 for Levi Stone of sandstone quarried in the Park. Its architect is unknown, but a wing was added in 1886 by McKim, Mead and White.

Only three other buildings by Davis survive. The last to be built was the Byerly-Kerr House (#59) of 1868, a simple house in the Second Empire style not often associated with Davis. Tyrden Terrace (#116), designed a decade earlier, is a frame Italianate villa distinguished by a semi-octagonal pavilion and a decorative verandah. It has been extensively altered. Also altered is the Frost House (#64), designed for Haskell's mother-in-law in 1855. Its essentially vernacular aspect (it appears to be an enlarged bracketed farmhouse) apparently resulted from the design being watered down by the client. A fourth house, revised by Davis from designs by Haskell, is a much-altered mansard cottage (#11) dating from ca. 1867.

Other Phase I houses include an 18th-century farmhouse enlarged sometime in the mid-19th century (#3), an L-plan vernacular house (#120), two Second Empire houses (#17 & #33) and a center-pavilion frame house with some minimal Italianate trim. Research by Jane B. Davies has established that these surviving houses once stood in the company of at least eight others built before 1860: a wooden Gothic Revival cottage by Calvert Vaux, a stone Gothic cottage and an Italianate villa (architects unknown), and a towered villa and three "Swiss" cottages by George F. Babb.

PHASE II: Most of the largest estates of this period have vanished. The only surviving parts of McKim Mead & White's Auchincloss Estate, for example, are a group of ancillary buildings (#65) in a shingle and clapboard mode similar to the firm's earliest New Jersey commissions. Most typical of the general effect that Park owners were striving for in this period is "Glenmont" (#37), a Queen Anne or Aesthetic Movement house designed ca. 1880 by Henry Hudson Holly and subsequently purchased by Thomas Edison. Its extravagant size and complex massing contrast sharply with the houses of the Haskell-Davis era.

Several smaller surviving houses built at about the same time (such as #39 and #69), were designed in a complex shingle and clapboard mode similar to that used for "Glenmont," but in a decidedly more vernacular vein. During the 1890s, other houses exhibit the transition from Queen Anne to Shingle Style (#117) and to a nascent Colonial Revival (#38).

Phase II also includes the Park's best collection of carriage houses and associated structures. They range in pretentiousness from the unassuming domestic scale of #48 (its jerkin-head wall dormers and clapboards reminiscent of Phase I buildings), to the rather monumental eclecticism of #147. Both date from the 1880s. The gable repetition of buildings #41 and #125, built in the 1890s, are variants of Shingle Style influence.

PHASE III: This period saw the Park's greatest surge of development, accounting for the construction of 81 surviving buildings. Like the Academic Reaction in general, Park architecture in this period falls heavily into the Colonial Revival Camp (41 buildings), with the second largest number (27 buildings) executed in a Norman-Tudor-English Cottage mode.

The Park's "Colonial Revival" architecture can be divided into several subcategories. First are the 5-bay center-hall frame houses derived from relatively vernacular American Georgian and Federal models. The most grandiose of these is #23, with its clear references to Mt. Vernon. Others are more restrained. (#1, #85, #97 and #111 are typical.)

More formal and English in their derivation are the brick Georgian Revival houses like #74, #103 and #104. Some rely more for effect on massing than ornament, in a Lutyens-esque "Wrennaissance" manner (such as #58, by Albro and Lindeburg, ca. 1927), while others (like #5) fall into the more common white-on-red neo-Georgian mode.

A third category, with most examples dating from the 1920s and '30s, consists of modest "Dutch Colonial" houses built on small lots for decidedly middle-class owners. Houses #67 and #68 are typical.

Similar divisions can be drawn in the second most popular category, houses inspired by models primarily Tudor in origin. The broad range of architectural quality found in this category is largely a matter of differences in detailing and craftsmanship. Some houses have a banal, stripped down quality, while others are richly articulated.

Half timbered houses like #13, #95 and #127 appear throughout Phase III. Brick or stucco versions without timbering usually depend on strong gabled forms. House #22, built in 1922, also makes use of banks of multipaned casements, flush eaves and tall chimneys with terra cotta pots. Houses #28 and #102 are good examples of the best repetitive-gable type. Probably the most richly detailed of this whole genre is the Anglo-Norman #108, which includes Gothic arches, oriels, round towers, clustered chimney stacks and a host of materials.

PHASE IV: Here we find a marked change in size and quality attributable to post-World War II economic conditions. As in Phase III, some houses are set apart by superior detailing, but most are of "subdivision quality," generally speaking, whether more or less expensive. Identifiable are "Builder's Colonial Revival" (#79, #124), Cape Cod (#137, #172), Ranch (#134 and #144) and a few split level designs (like #142). In the last decade, several owners have chosen a more contemporary idiom (like #53).

Historical Contrasts

The most striking aspect of Llewellyn Park is the degree to which its landscape design has resisted change. Aside from the upper acreage lost to Interstate 280, the topography and overall landscape scheme stand unaltered.

At least 80% of the Park's curvilinear road system is original. Additional roads (see Map No. 5) were designed to duplicate the scale of the 1850s carriageways, which are maintained today with a minimal amount of guttering, curbing and shoulders to closely approximate Haskell's rural-looking circulation system. Public street improvements to Park Avenue have encroached on the setback of the main entrance, and the loss of the pond to the south has made the approach less picturesque, but the survival of Davis' stone gatehouse and the general quality of the landscaping preserve the essential attributes evident in depictions dating from the 1860s.

The rustic-work shelters , furniture and fences, documented by photographs taken in the 1870s, have vanished, but the later gas lamps still light the roads. By its very nature landscape changes. The Park's plantings have matured since the days of Haskell and Davis and some areas have reverted to more naturalized conditions. Ironically, the overall impression is a bit wilder than it was at the end of the 19th century, but despite the loss of some details, the Park's character has been maintained with remarkable integrity.

The existing features of the land suggested its manner of development. Natural terraces climbing the slope of the mountain were suitable for building sites and a deep ravine became the centerpiece of a 50-acre parcel intended as the focal point for the individual lots. This park within the park was first known as Llewellyn Park. Not until 1860 was the overall acreage identified thusly, at which point the ravine lands became known as the Ramble.

The single most important event that guaranteed the future stability of the residential community was one that gave a legal basis to the shared aesthetic that had become Haskell's development premise. On February 28, 1857 he and his wife deeded to three trustees all of the lands eventually to be known as the "Ramble," for use as "a private pleasure ground ... to be freely ... used and enjoyed, as a place of resort and recreation" by the separate owners of the villa sites.[3] It was further specified that maintenance of this "pleasure ground," together with the public roads in the larger park, was to be accomplished by annually assessing the owners of the villas $10 per acre. Management of roads and the Ramble was put in the hands of a committee elected by the owners.

By 1860 Llewellyn Haskell's holdings had increased to 500 acres and he had spent the enormous sum of $100,000 to lay out villa sites and clear the tangle of underbrush, establish a pattern of curvilinear roads and implement a great deal of the overall landscape plan. His improvements also included the erection of a gatehouse designed by Davis in 1857 and a collection of rustic-work fences, bridges, kiosk, etc., also from Davis' hand. As the physical appearance of the park was beginning to approach its mature state, the details of organizing and carrying out its management were proceeding apace, sometimes by trial and error.

The only substantive source for these early details is the collection of minute books and related materials owned by the Llewellyn Park Association - a source nearly always reliable but not always complete or comprehensive.[4] The first recorded "Minutes of the Lot Owners" date from a meeting held at the gate lodge on January 11, 1858. Although nearly twenty lots had been sold, only six owners attended: L. S. Haskell, Charles J. Martin, Daniel A. Heald, Joseph Howard, Augustus O. Moore and Joseph A. Weder. Their chief order of business was electing a Committee of Managers, as called for in Haskell's Deed of Trust, to be constituted of five members.

The lot owners, by now known as the Proprietors, did not meet again formally until January 10, 1859. Once again, six owners attended:

Haskell, Martin, Heald, Levi P. Stone, Thomas B. Merrick and William Leconey. By this time the depression following the Panic of 1857 had probably begun to have some effect on Haskell's schemes (Llewellyn Park was only one constituent of his real estate holdings) and may have caused building lots to sell more slowly than anticipated. The next important event associated with the meeting of the Proprietors occurred on February 1, 1860, when Pierre Brunner, "Superintendent of the Park," submitted a report which the Proprietors ordered to be filed. The nature of the report and Brunner's identity and responsibilities are all unknown. In that same year $2,000 was collected in assessments ("taxes") and $5,571.55 expended. Smaller defecits were reported in the following two years, and in 1862 the first note was made of delinquent taxes, in the amount of $266.81. This problem was to be a recurrent one throughout the history of the Park.

Despite the monumental scale of Haskell's improvements, the Committee of Managers was charged with additional improvements and with cyclical maintenance tasks. Such needs prompted the Managers to seek voluntary contributions to supplement taxes. Despite financial strictures, Haskell encouraged the Proprietors to continue his grand and sometimes visionary plans. At the meeting of January 11, 1864, a committee was formed to procure estimates for constructing "a road to the top of the mountain" and to consider plans for lodges "at the several entrances now unprovided for." All of this at a time when the Civil War had brought domestic building trades to a standstill and threatened Haskell's overextended real estate empire with collapse.[5]

Several significant pieces of business were dealt with at the Meeting of January 9, 1865. Haskell's 1857 Deed of Trust made only two overtures in the direction of prototypical zoning controls. He specified that no business or trade could be carried on within the Park and established a minimum of one acre for building purposes. No restrictions were imposed on the siting or appearance of houses and public access to the Park was nowhere addressed. It was this last issue that concerned the Proprietors at their 1865 meeting, at which time they adopted the recommendations of a special committee, to whit:

> 1. The Proprietors issue their private cards to such of their friends and acquaintances as they may desire to have admitted to the Park, such cards to be given up by the holder at the gate and returned to the Proprietor.
> 2. That persons desiring to visit or call on residents of the Park be admitted on giving their names to the gatekeeper and indicating on whom they propose to call.

> 3. That respectable strangers from abroad who desire to visit the Park be admitted on recording their names and residences in a book to be kept by the gate-keeper for that purpose.

The third rule suggests that the Park may already have gained some European notice. The degree of exclusivity and public access imposed by the Proprietors would change at various times, as future minutes will show.

Methods of financing improvements were still very much at issue. The Proprietors, at the same meeting, requested that the "Trustees allow the income to be derived from the $100 per acre on all sales of land by Mr. Haskell to accumulate in their hands on interest if practicable." They went to postulate "That if said fund where so accumulated the first $1,000 be placed at the disposal of the Board of Managers to be appropriated to indispensable and permanent improvements on the roads, such as paving, gutters, McAdamising and building bridges."

The final significant piece of business was the adoption of a resolution praising Haskell's many services to the Park which began:

> Resolved by the Proprietors of Llewellyn Park that they deeply sympathize with Llewellyn S. Haskell in his recent severe calamity from the railroad collision in Bergen Tunnel, and tender him their sincere condolence ...

Haskell's accident was one from which he never fully recovered. Coming on the heels of his war-induced financial straits, it halted the vigorous application of his energies to the Park. Although he did not withdraw precipitously from the affairs of the Managers and Proprietors, 1865 marks, in many ways, the end of the first phase of Park development. It might be of some significance that on July 5, 1866 an advertisement nearly one newspaper column long appeared in The Independent, titled "Llewellyn Park, Country Homes for City People." The renewed effort at promotion may have been inspired by the combination of Haskell's personal removal from Park affairs and the doldrums of Civil War economics.

Since the Park had already achieved a large part of its mature appearance when the New-York Illustrated News published an article about it on June 23, 1860, Haskell's accident in no way aborted the realization of his grand scheme. The remainder of the 1860s seems to have been a period of attending to small details as the Proprietors and Committee of Managers continued to carry on the work begun by Haskell. In 1867, for example (recorded at the Manager's meeting of January 14), the first itemized accounting was made for expenditures, including the following:

Wages for gardener, gate-keeper and laborer.

Road repairs, McAdamizing, gravelling and stone guttering.

Stone culverts, iron gratings, rustic work, shrubbery, transplanting, slating summer house, etc.

Total Expenditures: $1,454.97

In view of the Park's purposely rustic nature, the use of McAdam surfacing is surprising. Many sizable northern New Jersey towns had few paved streets until the 20th century. Also of interest is the implication that a gardener and a laborer maintained the grounds, although additional work may have been contracted separately.

The following year (Committee of Managers, January 15) financial discomfiture is reflected in two items. Taxes were uncollected from Llewellyn S. Haskell, and the Managers resolved to "use all proper endeavors to aid Mr. Haskell in the sale of lands within the limits of the Park and encourage the building of residences on lots now unimproved." This resolution may have been motivated by a combination of self-interest and a genuine wish to assist Haskell. It may, in fact, be partly a response to a disagreement between the Managers and Haskell reflected in the minutes of January 14, 1867. Hakell had, for the first time, sold one-acre lots to buyers living outside the Park, something he was legally free to do. The Managers believed that this practice threatened the exclusivity and proprietary control implicit in the original development scheme and urged him "to decline future sales in a manner so injurious to himself and the proprietors." Incidents such as this began to build a stock of precedents for practical interpretation of how the Park was to be run.

It became clear in this period that even questions of landscape design would need to be addressed by the Managers and the Proprietors, since the Park was a constantly changing living organism. At the Managers meeting of January 31, 1869, the following report seems to establish that, at least by this point, no landscape designer was in charge:

> The committee of improvement, having expended the means provided for the improvement of the Park from the Stone bridge to Mountain Avenue would respectfully report that the work is not completed and cannot be in the manner it has so far been done, without special provision of funds for this purpose.

The committee would further remark that in their opinion it will cost about $1,500 to complete the improvement of the ground above mentioned and make such an improvement of the ravine and road borders below the bridge, as the great natural advantages of that locality demand.

We further suggest that while we think the Glen below the bridge should be kept as a Forrest we think it should be cleared of under brush and some superfluous trees, the ground cleaned, the holes and very rough places made less unsightly and the road borders finished neatly, that the great natural beauties of the ground may be seen by those riding on the borders and the walks become inviting to pedestrians.

Llewellyn S. Haskell's death in 1872 was the occasion of sincere regret on the part of the Proprietors, who almost immediately began to consider a suitable memorial (eventually a portrait bust) and who resolved:

That the works he has left behind him are the best monument of his generous and enterprising spirit, and of that love of the beautiful which, combined with his enthusiasm and his executive genius, achieved so much for the elevation of popular taste and for the adornment of this neighborhood, of which his eye first measured the capacity for improvement and picturesque development.

In 1873 (Managers meeting of January 13) policy governing access to the Park was altered upon petition of the Proprietors and a public notice to that effect was printed on April 15, 1873, signed by the five man Committee of Managers, who took pains to counter any impression of "apparent exclusiveness." It is unclear what prompted this new policy of liberality. Perhaps Haskell's death put in perspective the fact that his achievement had become, in some ways, a public trust.

The decades of the 1870s and 1880s saw the management confronted with technological advances that had to be dealt with in the special context of the Park's aesthetics. Some representative entries from the minutes tell the story. In 1871 more McAdamizing was noted and the "Roadmaster" reported having bought a mowing mechanism for $60

(meetings of the Managers, February 21 and April 10). At the Manager's meeting of January 9, 1882 it was resolved that telephone wires would be permitted underground only (a policy of remarkable foresight for its day), that the comparative costs of lighting the roads by means of electricity or gas should be investigated and that "proper signs for all the Avenues, Roads and Ways of the Park" should be erected. The question of telephone wires continued to vex the Managers. On April 16, 1887 they instructed the Secretary to "notify the Telephone Company to remove the wires near the Park entrance to a less dangerous and unsightly position."

Judging from the Manager's minutes of October 13, 1890 lighting the roads had still not been accomplished. It was noted that a proposal had been received from the N.J. Globe Gas Light Company and residents were asked to subscribe to a "lamp tax" for this purpose. Despite the fact that Thomas A. Edison was then the Park's most famous resident, gas was finally chosen over electricity, and the roads remain so lighted today. In 1889 (see the Manager's minutes of April 22) the residents united to stave off extension of Park Avenue through the Park to Mt. Pleasant Avenue.

The foregoing notations, more than a sampling of random actions, illustrate two phenomenon that continued to color the Park's history: First, the commitment by the Managers and Proprietors to maintain the Park's physical integrity and second, the difficulty of financing maintenance and improvements. Both issues are related to the sale of lots and density of development. By 1873 no more than 45 families were resident on roughly 750 acres; by 1913 their number had increased by only nine. Such low density enhanced the aesthetic qualities enjoyed by the residents but, ironically, made it difficult to raise money to protect those same qualities.

Not until the 20th century did several physical changes effect a more reasonable compromise between aesthetic and practical concerns. Between 1913 and 1941, five new roads were introduced into the Park's circulation system, which had remained virtually unaltered since the 1860s. Four of these roads were added at various peripheral locations (see Map No. 5) and did little to impact the original landscape plan. The fifth, connecting Park Way and Glen Avenue, subdivided a central section without interrupting any natural features of special interest. Approximately thirty new houses were built as a result of this road construction, increasing the total number of residences to 88 by 1941.

In that same year, as part of a zoning revision in West Orange at large, three zones were established in the Park (see Map No. 5). In general, these provisions institutionalized existing practice, but the minimal acreage for lots in most of the Park was actually increased (Zone A-3) from Haskell's stipulation, although a new A-1 Zone encouraged small-lot construction (20,000 sq. ft.) on the Park's eastern periphery. Zoning regulations, the construction of one additional road and the subdivision of some large parcels accounted for the largest spurt of growth in the Park's history: Between 1941 and the present, the number of residences increased by more than sixty. Such dramatic growth did not occur without losses. Several important houses were demolished (notably the Auchincloss House, by McKim, Mead and White) simply because they were too expensive to maintain. Pieces of other large properties were subdivided off and new construction was not always sited with care. Losses of this kind were part of the history of the Park, however; from its early days, significant buildings (including a handful by Davis) had been lost to fire and demolition. On balance, the ability to gain revenues from new proprietors, thus enabling the Managers to conserve the landscape design, has compensated for losses -- at least to date.

The greatest damage to the Park's integrity came about in the 1960s when Interstate 280 was routed across the top of the mountain, slicing off substantial acreage on the western boundary. Not only land but houses were lost. Although invisible from most of the Park, noise, air pollution and vibrations carry beyond the right-of-way, views from certain portions of Tulip and Mountain Avenues are impaired and Castlewood, one of the few surviving buildings by Davis, stands perilously close to the highway. The insensitivity of the route is matched only by Interstate 287 in Morristown, where it runs within a hundred feet of the Jacob Ford Mansion, a National Historic Landmark.

The depredations of Route 280 and other forces reduced the Park's acreage from its 19th century high of 700+ acres to a present total of approximately 420 acres. Fortunately, all of the existing total consists of the central and most significant portions envisioned by Haskell and Davis. Of the Ramble, the Glen, the Forest and the Hill (see Map No. 1), only the last has been reduced in size.[6]

If physical change marked the transition of the Park into the 20th century, human and social change did as well. In 1901 Daniel Heald died. One of the six men who attended the first meeting of lot owners on January 11, 1858, he served from that time until his death as Secretary of the Board of Managers and was recognized as the Park's "oldest constant resident." 1907 saw the death of two others intimately connected with the Park's nascent years, Orson D. Munn, publisher of The Scientific American (a Park resident since 1870) and Wendell Phillips Garrison, founder and editor of the Nation. Garrison was the third son of abolitionist William Lloyd Garrison who settled in the Park with his family in 1866. Because they carried forward Llewellyn S. Haskell's altruism, dedication to preserving natural beauty and an appreciation of the land as more than a commodity, these men and their contemporaries bequeathed to the Park a rare sense of purpose and continuity, more than merely institutional, that has lasted to this day and still informs the judgement of its directors.

Distaff participation in Park affairs grew in the 20th century as well. The Ladies' Association existed in the 19th century and by 1914 had two representatives on the Board of Managers for the first time in the history of the Park. The women of the Association enjoyed a large role in grounds maintenance, not simply choosing and planting flowers, but suggesting and raising money for improvements not covered by the regular budget. It was they who first suggested, in 1900, that the Park hire its own constable. In 1921 four women served on the nine-member Board of Managers. During the 1930s and '40s the Proprietor's and Manager's minutes reflect the cohesiveness of a small community. They contain much humor, often genteel but barbed wit, often expressed by the women, and often at the expense of their spouses. In 1936, for example, at a January 13 meeting of the Board of Proprietors, Mrs. Russell Colgate, reporting on proposed improvements to pedestrian paths, confessed that "she had been advised that a path two feet wide was sufficient for two people if they were not married but if they were married, four feet wide would not be too much ... ."

The cohesive "family" atmosphere of Llewellyn Park, engendered by exclusivity, has not been without its abuses, understandable when assessing the historical context. A 1980 "New York Times Article" had this to say about it:

> Once an enclave of white Anglo Saxon Protestantism, Llewellyn Park had maintained its homogeneity by dint of tradition and genteel insistence; homes were either passed on to children or sold to individuals likely to prove to be acceptable neighbors. And the board of managers was said to have used the right to accept or reject prospective purchasers to screen out "undesirables." Although first proded undoubtedly by Federal legislation passed in the 1960's outlawing such discrimination, the park by all accounts now makes those of varying backgrounds quite comfortable.

The biggest challenge likely to face the residents of Llewellyn Park from this point on is how to cope with the demands of pluralism without losing the solidarity that makes possible the preservation of their unique environment.

Cultural Influences

The development of Llewellyn Park resulted in large part from the vision of one man, Llewellyn S. Haskell. How his conception and implementation of the Park plan was inspired by contemporary religious, philosophical and artistic thinking is a question critical to pose but difficult to answer. So little primary source material exists by or about Haskell that any examination of how he conceptualized the Park is peppered with conjecture.

Tracing Haskell's circle of friends and their intellectual pedigrees may provide one reasonably accurate method of setting his achievement in some sort of historical context.[7]

Haskell was acquainted with both Alexander Jackson Davis and Andrew Jackson Downing, who themselves were friends and professional associates. Davis as architect and Downing as horticulturist and critic were enormously influential in cultivating an American taste for romantic buildings in picturesque landscapes. Both men, to some degree, were also adherents of radical religious or philosophical systems. Downing was involved with the Unitarian and Transcendentalist movements and was a friend of William Cullen Bryant whose poetic exaltations of nature stimulated the American taste for landscape. Davis seems to have had more than a passing interest in Swedenborgianism and often heard Emerson speak. Haskell himself was claimed by some as an adherent of Perfectionism (a Swedenborgian sect), but his daughter, in 1916, flatly denied such an association.[8]

The symbolic and transcendental associations that characterized Swedenborg's and Emerson's theories were matched by mid 19th century artistic currents that glorified nature. Edenic, Arcadian and Wilderness imagery was employed in a purposeful attempt to suppress the image of machine and industrialization. The metaphoric or mystical paintings of Innes, Cole, Durand and Church, like the writings of Thoreau and Emerson, had become part of the standard intellectual furniture of educated, upper-middle-class Americans like Llewellyn Haskell, whether or not they subscribed to the theories that informed such works. One can easily imagine Haskell having read enough of Thoreau, for example, to be familiar with the suggestion that every American town set aside a park of 500 acres as "a common possession forever, for instruction and recreation."

Even if Haskell were ignorant of the specific attitudes that colored literature and painting of Transcendentalist persuasion, the general intellectual and artistic ferment of the 1840s and '50s seems sufficient to have prompted the visualization of his residential park. Since Haskell left no known theoretical comments about his intentions, it is impossible to say if Nature had become for him, like the radical Protestant clergy, "a substitute for the mystery and revelation of formal religion." The popular press did not hesitate to draw connections, however. In 1866, an article in the "Newark Daily Advertiser" linked Haskell and Emerson when it observed, "what the transcendental philosopher [Emerson] suggests, Mr. Haskell with the true perceptions of genius has carried into practice in his idea of Llewellyn Park ... ."

If the impulses that inspired Haskell's landscape philosophy are difficult to isolate with any certainty, the same is true about his approach to ownership and community. Like Transcendentalism, Utopianism was part of the intellectual climate of the period. Horace Greely and others championed the Frenchman Charles Fourier, whose socialist theories included a prescription for cooperative units called "phalanxes" where residents could work and commune with nature in idealistic circumstances. Fourierism in America sparked myriad splinter groups (such as Brook Farm and the Oneida community), which ranged from incorporating most to almost none of Fourier's ideas. Two New Jersey groups with Fourierist sympathies were the North American Phalanx in Red Bank and the Raritan Bay Union at Eagleswood in Perth Amboy. Both had been established before Haskell began buying land in West Orange and both attracted the interest of some of the same people who came to have connections with Llewellyn Park. Davis, for one, designed buildings for the Raritan Bay Union and Downing's plans to advise the North American Phalanx on landscaping were aborted by his untimely death. Abolitionist Theodore Weld and his wife Angelina were prime movers behind the Raritan Bay Union. When that experiment collapsed, the Weld's established a school at Eagleswood where Haskell sent his son, who roomed there with Charles McKim whose abolitionist father James Miller McKim moved his family to Llewellyn Park soon after. Theodore Weld was also a principal patron of George Inness, who moved to Eagleswood in 1859.

This complex web of associations suggests many generalized points of reference for Haskell's thinking but fails to establish any definite Fourierist or Utopian leanings. On the contrary, a close examination of the system of ownership and management Haskell set up shows that it lacked the basic feature of Fourierism, communal ownership of property. As Jane B. Davies points out, "Haskell's advertisements of Llewellyn Park property for sale contain absolutely no hint of any ideological constraints on the purchasers. It was a planned community in the freest sense with no restrictions (except the usual 'nuisance clause') and with a democratically elected committee to manage only the basic problems."[9] The absence of any regular program of communal activities or communal meeting hall further removes Llewellyn Park from consideration as a Utopian or Socialist commune in the strict definition of those terms. Any Socialist or freethinking identity is even further undercut when one examines the professions and personalities of the early property owners. Although their number included a spiritualist, a homeopathic physician, an artist and several prominent abolitionists, most were successful businessmen with a love of nature -- like Haskell. Men such as Levi P. Stone, Daniel A. Heald, and Edwin C. Burt, who made their fortunes from mundane pursuits like dry goods, insurance and shoes, represented the capitalist underpinnings of the Park.

More detailed biographical information about Llewellyn Haskell might yield a clearer understanding of his motives and philosophy. From what we do know it seems apparent that he was neither a Socialist nor a Perfectionist. Far from being an ideologue of any stripe, he seems simply to have been an unusually altruistic capitalist bent on sharing his passionate (and Transcendentally informed?) love of nature. The appelation "Utopian" sometimes applied to Llewellyn Park seems ironic, in fact, if one recalls that not one such community dating from the 1840s and 1850s survived for very long, while Haskell's pragmatic experiment shows no signs of failure.

Landscape Design

Determining who designed Llewellyn Park is as knotty a problem as its design antecedents and subsequent influence are clear. When American art and culture moved from classical to romantic models in the 1830s and 1840s, English precedents were once again called into play, since their romantic bias was already well established. Particularly influential were the voluminous works of John Claudius Loudon, known to both Davis and Downing, especially his Suburban Gardener and Villa Companion, which incorporated commentary on the values of suburban life.

In addition to theoretical models, England had begun to produce, in the 1830s and 1840s, a burgeoning number of picturesquely landscaped urban parks and "villa estates," including Birkenhead Park, visited by Frederick Law Olmsted in 1850, seven years after it was begun, and Prince's Park, which William Cullen Bryant had visited in 1845.[10]

Romantic landscape design had already reached America in the 1830s in the somewhat unlikely form of cemetery design. Three influential cemeteries appeared during that decade, in Boston (Mt. Auburn, 1831), Philadelphia (Laurel Hill, 1836) and Brooklyn (Greenwood, 1838), but they yielded no immediate progeny in the form of public parks (although the cemeteries themselves were so used) or residential developments. The first American plan for a residential suburb appears to have been published by William Ranlett in his 1847 book, The Architect. Three years later (and three years before Haskell began buying land in Orange) Andrew Jackson Downing published an essay in the Horticulturist which describes an ideal "country village." It should incorporate, he advised, a centralized common or park of between twenty and fifty acres that would serve as the heart of the community. This feature and others described by Downing bear a striking resemblance to the plan of Llewellyn Park.

In 1851 two communities were laid out that have some claim to important suburban characteristics -- Evergreen Hamlet near Pittsburgh and Glendale, Ohio, but neither could boast of the comprehensive layout, large acreage, dramatic siting or overwhelmingly romantic impression of Haskell's project. Thus the physical design of Llewellyn Park is the first significant realization of a residential development imbued with the characteristics of the best English models as translated through Downing, with additional characteristics derived from the wilder and more expansive nature of the American landscape.[11]

Nowhere in the archive of the Llewellyn Park Association, the A. J. Davis papers found at several institutions, or in any other source is there definitive evidence establishing the author of the Llewellyn Park landscape design. Davis is the most likely candidate (Downing had died in 1852), at least superficially, until we look closely at the facts. Jane B. Davies makes the following convincing observations:

> From studying Davis' Day Book, I do not see how he could have directed the detailed laying out of the Park, because of lack of time, training, and experience -- though Davis did have some experience with smaller situations, including some landscape designing for Haskell's own Belmont. Davis and Haskell became close friends. In the key years, 1853-1857, Davis was often at Orange Mountain (usually weekends), but he specified chiefly directing the clearing of his own property and working with Haskell on architectural designs, including the Eyrie, gate lodge, Arcade Villa, remodeling other farmhouses and a number of designs apparently not executed. Haskell and Davis must have discussed the plans underway, but in what detail? Davis left no record of fees charged for landscaping work there, drawing maps, etc. Somebody had to be on the scene directing the surveyors, road and bridge builders, men planting thousands of trees, bushes, and other plants (as well as deciding and ordering these), deciding which trees were to be preserved and what tangled underbrush was to be cleared away. It was really a large undertaking.[12]

If Davis was not the presiding genius, who then? Three other names are mentioned in connection with landscape work in the Park: Eugene Baumann, Howard Daniels and James MacGall (or McGall). The first two are named in a Crayon article for August, 1857, which characterizes the Park as "the first development, so far as we know, of an idea which may mark a new era in Country Life and Landscape Gardening in this country."

Baumann was a Swiss or Alsation "Landscapist" who delineated the plans for the Ramble and laid out five acres of grounds for Arcade Cottage, a house in the Park that Haskell had Davis design for speculative purposes. Henry Winthrop Sargent published both designs in his supplement to the sixth edition of Downing's Treatise on ... Landscape Gardening (N.Y., 1859). One year previous to the Crayon article Baumann was joined in practice by Jacob Weidenmann a Swiss-born and German-trained architect, who may possibly have participated in the Llewellyn Park work. Howard Daniels' name is significant in connection with the Park because he had returned in 1856 from England, where he had become acquainted with suburban "Villa Parks," the title of an article he contributed to the Horticulturist in 1858. His description of "groups of villas, with gardens of greater or less extent, surrounding a park of from ten to one hundred acres, which is owned, managed, and used exclusively by the residents of the surrounding villas" bears an unquivocal relationship to Llewellyn Park, although the Ramble had already been laid out by this time. James MacGall, the third man whose name has been mentioned in connection with Haskell's work, bears the most tenuous connection, resting entirely on family tradition and the fact that he advertised professionaly in the Orange Journal of 1858.[13]

Part of the problem with assigning authorship of the Park's design is the fact that the profession of landscape architect as we are familiar with it today did not exist in America at the time. Prior to Olmsted, there are only rare examples of large-scale landscape projects carried through from conceptual stage to implementation that are attributable to one man (John Notman's Laurel Hill might be cited). It seems likely, therefore (based on evidence largely conjectural), that the planning and execution of Llewellyn Park resulted from a collaborative and incremental approach. If, as seems evident, Davis discovered the site, he may have proposed the basic idea of a suburban retreat which both he and Haskell could have conceptualized in stages. With technical assistance from men like Baumann and Daniels, and perhaps an ongoing critique from Davis, Haskell, a passionate amateur in an age when distinctions between amateurs and professionals were less stringent, could certainly have been the Park's intellectual and practical overseer, informed by Downing's books, the Horticulturist and other contemporary sources. Jane B. Davies neatly summarizes the scant but convincing evidence in these words:

> It appears likely that the presiding genius with the over-all ideas was Haskell himself, as the contemporary accounts and the reminiscences of his contemporaries and his son indicate, and that, "passionately fond of landscape gardening." he took an active part in directing the work. His health had been broken by overwork about 1850 and he devoted a great deal of time to the development of the park, apparently partially retiring from business at first, then withdrawing entirely from his firm about 1859. "The landscape gardening work of making the Park was very congenial, out of door work, laying out many miles of roads on the mountainside, planting trees and shrubs by the ten thousand of a single kind," wrote his son, "and he enjoyed it very much."[14]

Haskell's achievement quickly made an impact. The previously cited June 23rd, 1860 issue of the New-York Illustrated News described the Park in effusive prose, supplemented with wood engravings picturing its landscape features and architecture. A year before, Henry Winthrop Sargent's supplement to the sixth edition of Downing's influential A Treatise on ... Landscape Gardening featured engravings of Baumann's plans for the Ramble and Arcade Cottage together with notes on the Park's management. Closer to home, an 1866 article in the Newark Daily Advertiser waxed metaphysical:

> In an hour from New York this spot can be reached, and its occupant can here meet, almost as it were by enchantment, the calm quiet of a primeval forest free from all interruption, with all the refinement that taste and education can suggest, and as he slowly drives over the fine roads, and under the tall and overhanging trees, catching at intervals glimpses of the bay of New York, or the highlands of Staten Island, or the tall steeple of Trinity, reminding him of the fever and hot haste going on under its very shadow, what a change must he not experience! Now cares, be they never so cankering, must give place to calm and holy thoughts![15]

More important than popular and critical acclaim is the evidence of emulation. In 1857, the year of A. J. Davis' design for the Llewellyn

Park gatehouse, the City of New York announced a competition for "a central park," a fact that makes it obvious that the first stages of Haskell's undertaking were already complete before Frederick Law Olmsted, the competition's winner, had begun to work on his mammoth urban scheme. Olmsted knew Davis, was indebted to Downing's work (his eventual partner Calvert Vaux had been associated with Downing and had designed at least one villa for Llewellyn Park)and was profoundly influenced by the Ramble and by Haskell's entire accomplishment. When approached in 1865 to design the campus of the College of California (now Berkeley), Olmsted referred to the project as one "which I propose to lay out on the Llewellyn plan."[16] Riverside, Illinois, second in importance only to Llewellyn Park as an early example of a comprehensively designed romantic suburb, was begun by Olmsted, Vaux & Co. in 1868-1869 with the "Llewellyn plan" clearly in mind once again. Albert Fein talks about "Olmsted's and Vaux's regard for that achievement [Llewellyn Park], which served as a prototype for all their future efforts to plan communities." And again, "The concept of the planned community, as executed in Llewellyn Park and in Olmsted's adaptation of that form [emphasis added], was quite revolutionary in American urban development." By the post-Civil War years romantic suburban developments of the Llewellyn Park variety (though few were comparable in quality or size) had become an accepted form. When Stewart Hartshorn, a businessman, inventor and nature-lover very like Llewellyn Haskell, bought wilderness acreage in nearby Springfield, New Jersey in 1877 to develop the village that became Short Hills, he quite naturally laid out roads to follow the contours of the land, preserved its clear streams and Chestnut forest and prohibited all but residential construction, demonstrating by these policies that in only twenty years Llewellyn Haskell's standards had become the norm for any idealistic development scheme.

Architecture

Llewellyn Park was not the seminal event for American romantic architecture that it was for landscape design. The reaction against classically inspired architecture was already well established by the time Llewellyn Haskell began to implement his plans. Downing's Cottage Residences (1842) and The Architecture of Country Houses (1850) were only two of the more important theoretical and practical books to popularize romantic domestic architecture. During the 1840s and '50s public enthusiasm for the picturesque was stimulated by a host of architect-authors, including Gervase Wheeler, William Ranlett, John Warren Ritch, Edward Shaw, Calvert Vaux and Samuel Sloan, all of whom had published at least one book before 1857 -- by which date A. J. Davis had already made his name as the pre-eminent designer of romantic cottages and villas.

So if the dwellings that began to rise beside Haskell's towering trees were fashionable and up-to-date, they were not revolutionary. Among them were Gothic Revival, Italinante, Swiss and, after the Civil War, Second Empire designs (a "Turkish" villa designed by Davis was never built). One of the precepts of the Romantic Movement in architecture was the integration of picturesque man-made and natural forms -- the design of a house should respond to an appropriately evocative rural site. Since American landscape design had not kept pace with architectural design this was not so easy to achieve. Many, if not most, of the newly romantic houses were built on small lots in small towns or villages on gridded streets antithetical to the ideal picturesque situation. Exceptions can easily be mentioned, of course, like Vaux's "Olana"and Davis' "Lyndhurst," but they were designed for clients who commanded more than middle-class means.

Llewellyn Park became the first concentrated collection of picturesque dwellings appropriately sited in a picturesque environment where a successful interaction of art and nature might be achieved without the expense of owning fifty acres.

[1]The chief secondary source used for this nomination is "Llewellyn Park in West Orange, New Jersey," by Jane B. Davies, Antiques, January 1975, pp. 143-155. Although not lengthy, it is by far the most scholarly and accurate treatment of Llewellyn Park to date, serving as a corrective to the sloppy research and unfounded generalizations that mar most treatments of the Park. Where no other source is given in the nomination or on the survey forms, this article should be referred to for both text and notes.

[6]Total acreage and boundaries are not easily determined for a great part of the Park's history as land was bought and sold. The reduction from 700± acres to 420± acres is not the dramatic loss it might seem, since muchof the lost acreage was peripheral and the present boundaries define all of the land most important to the original scheme.

[7]Jane B. Davies cautions against drawing conclusions about Llewellyn S. Haskell's motives. The following possible connections are important, however, even when they raise rather than answer questions.

SIGNIFICANCE:
Were it not for documentary evidence, this would be accepted at its face value as a vernacular farmhouse-type dwelling. Jane B. Davies, however, discovered correspondence between Llewellyn Haskell's mother-in-law, Anna R. Frost, and A.J. Davis pertaining to it design. Frost wrote to Davis in October 1855: "I have been purchasing a lot of about 3 acres, on which to erect a modest, comfortable dwelling for mysely & I should be glad to have your ideas of laying it out with some taste but at no great expense. I have a plan, which if you can improve I shall be glad, but comfort in my opinion supersedes [sic] every other consideration in building & meretricious ornaments I do not desire . . . Of course I should like you to bring some plans for houses, but let them be economical." Jane B. Davies surmises that "this determined Southern lady must have trimmed down the design that Davis produced a month later, for he considered its execution 'shameful'; the comfortable frame house has since been much altered.'

SIGNIFICANCE: Before being degraded w/ aluminum siding and altered fenestration (sliding glass doors in the wings), this must have been a house of considerably more architectural interest. Its massing and surviving detailing suggest a reliance on New England vernacular models, a contrast to most other Colonial Revival work in the Park during this period.

SURROUNDING ENVIRONMENT: Urban ☐ Suburban ☑ Scattered Buildings ☐
Open Space ☐ Woodland ☑ Residential ☐ Agricultural ☐ Village ☐
Industrial ☐ Downtown Commerical ☐ Highway Commercial ☐ Other ☐

SIGNIFICANCE:

Like its architectural appearance, the date of this house seems somewhat problematical. The usually reliable assessor's records claim it dates from 1881, but stylistically this seems a bit late. It does not appear on the 1873 map. Alterations may be confusing the issue. As it stands now it is rather difficult to describe stylistically.

SIGNIFICANCE: Like a number of Tudor Revival houses in the Park devoid of half-timbering or other detailing, this example makes use of repeated gables as its dominant motif. It is representative of a class of rather "stripped down" Tudorish houses that seem, in their plainess and geometric qualities, to be striving after modernism.

SIGNIFICANCE: The 1873 map depicts this lot as developed and belonging to "Mrs. E. B." The surviving building seems to have been an ancillary structure of some kind. The window in the wall dormer is the same kind uused by A.J. Davis as dormers in the Byerly-Kerr House and the mansard cottage he revised from Haskell's drawings. Presumably this was an outbuilding on Mrs. Byerly's property and was likely designed by Davis.

SIGNIFICANCE: This is the most puzzling of the houses dating from the first phase of the Park's development. It includes some Gothic, Italianate and generally Picturesque elements, none of which add up to an identifiable style. Further research as to alterations and associative history is called for.

Industrial ☐ Downtown Commerical ☐ Highway Commercial ☐ Other ☐

SIGNIFICANCE: Tyrdyn Terrace is one of Davis' two Italianate villas for the Park and the only one to have survived. Originally intended for masonry, it was simplified by the architect, probably for reasons ofcost at the request of the client, Thomas B. Merrick.

In 1869 the property was acquired by Orson D. Munn, founder of the Scientific American. Munn added to the house substantially and laid out an elaborate series of terraced gardens, now gone, on the sloping land that rises behind the house.

DESCRIPTION *(Owner's address is West Orange unless noted otherwise.)

Construction Date: probably begun in 1858

Source of Date: see REFERENCES, over

Architect: Alexander Jackson Davis

Builder:

Style: Gothic Revival

Form/Plan Type: Irregular rectangular block connected to stable by verandah

Number of Stories: 2 over high basement + 4-story tower

Foundation: Random traprock

Exterior Wall Fabric: Random traprock

Fenestration: Multipaned sash, elliptical, lancet and trabeated, some stained glass

Roof/Chimneys: Gable & conical tower roof

Additional Architectural Description: Castellation defines the roofline of all but the round tower, which is joined to the square tower, the highest point of the building. A castellated porte-cochere reaches out to the entry drive on the the west elevation, and on the east a long loggia/ verandah (supported on the ground floor by stone piers) has been insensitively enclosed. The castellated stone stable w/ apsidal east elevation is actually a separate structure connected to the house by a "cloistered" walk. Because it is built into the hill, the east elevation of the main block is a story higher than the west.

SITING, BOUNDARY DESCRIPTION, AND RELATED STRUCTURES: The house is sited near the road on a large open lot w/ the cliffs of Orange Mountain as a backdrop to the west and the forested Ramble below on the east. A 2x8-bay stucco barn stands to the south, not a part of the Gothic ensemble.

SIGNIFICANCE: Designed in 1857 for Joseph C. Howard, a local businessman, "Castlewood" matches its picturesque setting w/ bold, irregular & picturesque massing, illustrating the basic tenets of Romantic landscape and architectural interaction espoused by Davis and Downing. Never completed by Howard, the house was taken over by Llewellyn Haskell, who lived there for a time, but who also failed to implement the ambitious improvements designed for "Castlewood" by Davis. Recent alterations have not approached the building with the degree of understanding its significance calls for. According to Jane B. Davies, it is the only surviving example by Davis of a castle-type villa. It is one of the three most important survivors of the Park's first phase of development.

Foundation: Rubble fieldstone and ashlar sandstone

Exterior Wall Fabric: Clapboard

Fenestration: 2/2, 6/6 & two surviving 12/12 sash

Roof/Chimneys: Asphalt shingled gable, w/ end returns on older wing. Both wings have interior brick chimneys

Additional Architectural Description: Original 2-bay house seems to have been 2 rooms, now thrown together, with the addition of an 18th-century bay adjacent to the fireplace. There is no trace of the original stair. The roof of the 19th-century wing is perpendicular to that of the older house. The new wing has wooden string courses, shingling and molded bargeboards. The dining room has a green marble oak leaf and acorn mantel. A modern 2-car frame garage is attached.

SIGNIFICANCE: Reflecting the hybridizing tendencies of the Period Revival in the first third of the 20th century, this house is basically symmetrical but has picturesque tendencies nonetheless. Its steep gable and entry and "eyelid" projections above the second-floor windows suggest English Cottage architecture (the roof looks as if it should be thatched), but the crisp clapboard siding is American vernacular in feeling.

SIGNIFICANCE: The kicked eaves and the juxtaposition of sandstone w/ clapboard gables suggest the designer was inspired in part by the 18th-centurt "Dutch" houses of the Hudson Valley. The masonry treatment and the more formal main entry recall vernacular Georgian/Federal-period houses of the Pennsylvania culture region. This is a departure from the more high-style masonry houses (cf. #5) or wooden houses (cf. #23) found in the Park during the same period.

SITING, BOUNDARY DESCRIPTION, AND RELATED STRUCTURES: Located on a large lot hiiden from the road by trees, it has an L-plan 3-car garage atthe entrance.

SURROUNDING ENVIRONMENT: Urban ☐ Suburban ☑ Scattered Buildings ☐
Open Space ☐ Woodland ☑ Residential ☐ Agricultural ☐ Village ☐
Industrial ☐ Downtown Commerical ☐ Highway Commercial ☐ Other ☐

SIGNIFICANCE: Another house difficult to classify stylistically, its effect is derived from massing and strong forms instead of ornament. Craftsman influence is found in the large expanses of plain stuccoed wall surface and the overall simplicity of treatment, although there remains something English about the house that an examination of the interior might make more comprehensible.

SIGNIFICANCE: The projecting central pavilion or bay often used on 3-bay houses of this period is here translated into what is really an oversize wall dormer w/ sweeping concave roof. This feature, the steeply gabled dormers and the large round-headed windows make it atypical of Second Empire houses. It is significant as a transitional house between the first and second phases of the Park's development. Its appearance would be improved substantially by authentic color treatment.

HISTORIC NAME: "Landmore"
LOCATION: Oak Bend

COMMON NAME:
BLOCK/LOT 102/7A, 12/A

MUNICIPALITY: West Orange (Llewellyn Park)
USGS QUAD: Orange
OWNER/ADDRESS: * M/M Stanley H. Katz

COUNTY: Essex
UTM REFERENCES: Zone/Northing/Easting

DESCRIPTION *(Owner's address is West Orange unless noted otherwise)

Construction Date: 1931

Source of Date: See REFERENCES

Architect: Delano & Aldrich

Builder: Eliot C. Brown Co., NYC

Style: neoclassical (pre-Georgian)

Form/Plan Type: three-bay center wing (divided into 9 fenestration bays) is flanked by two slightly offset wings

Number of Stories: 2½

Foundation: Ashlar

Exterior Wall Fabric: coursed granite/fieldstone

Fenestration: 6/6 & 6/12 sash

Roof/Chimneys: Slate hip with 7 stone chimneys

Additional Architectural Description: A stone parapet wall rises above a wooden modillioned cornice. The double-leaf main entry is framed with a cut-stone surround and capped with a swan's neck pediment enclosing a cartouche. At the rear, the center bay swells into a gentle curve, and on this facade some of the full-length ground-floor windows are round-arched. The rear garden is enclosed by a stone wall with round-arched entry. The overall impression of the facade is one of classical symmetry, severely rendered with little ornament, and given a somewhat rustic air by the quality of the masonry.

SITING, BOUNDARY DESCRIPTION, AND RELATED STRUCTURES:

The house is set on a low earth podium, approached from Oak Bend by a broad expanse of lawn (approximately 700'), large even by Llewellyn Park standards. Artfully composed stands of evergreen and deciduous trees frame the house. The property encompasses 6¼ acres.

SIGNIFICANCE:

Charles A. Edison (1890-1969) and his wife Carolyn assembled the property for "Landmore" in 1927. Construction was begun the following year and completed in 1931, using stone from the abandoned Edison Iron Mines (in what is now Edison, NJ). Charles Edison's choice of Llewellyn Park for his residence continued a family tradition: he had grown up in the nearby house of his father Thomas Alva Edison. From 1933 until 1940, Charles Edison held various posts in the administration of Franklin D. Roosevelt. In 1940 he served as Secretary of the Navy. After his term as Governor of New Jersey (1941-1944), Edison and his wife moved to New York City, but used "Landmore" from time to time for entertaining. Edison continued to visit the house once a month to meet with the staff until his death. From 1969 until 1973, the house was tenanted by the Edison Fund, from which the present owners acquired it.

Architects for "Landmore" were Delano & Aldrich. William Adams Delano (1874-1960) and Chester Holmes Aldrich (1871-1940) were both products of the Ecole des Beaux Arts, Paris, and maintained a partnership for the entire length of their professional lives. The were adept at various revival styles, but were (see below)

COMMENTS: SIGNIFICANCE continued: perhaps best known for their neo-Georgian work. Among their significant commissions in NY metropolitan area are the Willard Straight House (NYC), the W.V.S. Thorne House (Morristown, NJ), the Knickerbocker Club, and the original buildings for LaGuardia Airport. Between 1949 and 1952, they worked on the renovation of the White House.

"Landmore" is judged a CONTRIBUTING property in the Llewellyn Park Historic District

SIGNIFICANCE: Although the historically correct phase of the Colonial Revival was operative by 1896, this house is neoclassical in only selective ways, taking some of its massing, gable treatment and cladding ideas from the Shingle Style and to a small extent from the Queen Anne mode. It also shows that solidly upper-middle-class dwellings were being built in the Park by this date, not only estate-size houses. Cf. houses #39 & 69.

Form/Plan Type: 3-bay center entry + rear wing L-form addition

Number of Stories: 2

Foundation: Partially cemented ashlar brownstone & brick

Exterior Wall Fabric: Board and batten w/ narrow cornerboards

Fenestration: Diamond-paned lancet and trabeated casements & 9/1 sash. Some lancets replaced with trabeated windows. Circular windows at front & rear.

Roof/Chimneys: Asphalt shingle hip w/ large cross-gable and dormer-like gables above second story windows.

Additional Architectural Description: Flat-roofed porch carried on 4 octagonal columns and two semi-octagonal pilasters w/ simple brackets. Column bases have been cut away and shored up w/ cement block. Original porch platform replaced w/ slate and cement brick. Modern metal gutters and leaders have been installed.

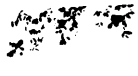

Original part of house has two sets of triple-stacked chimneys set diagonally on clapboard bases flanking the cross gable. The brick is badly in need of repointing and the stacks are finished w/ mismatched terra cotta pots. Double-leaf front door is hidden behind aluminum storm door. Most of the windows are fitted w/ aluminum storm/screen sash.

Double-height paired lancet window in front gable has wooden drip mold. Flanking circular windows are set in octagonal frames and have louvered blinds. Large circular window in rear gable is patterned w/ 6-pointed star.

SITING, BOUNDARY DESCRIPTION, AND RELATED STRUCTURES: Three-bay rectangular carriage house w/ gable roof and wall dormers converted to garage w/ apartments above. The Levi P. Stone House stands directly across the road from the Nichols cottage.

Open Space ☐ Woodland ☑ Residential ☐ Agricultural ☐ Village ☐
Industrial ☐ Downtown Commerical ☐ Highway Commercial ☐ Other ☐

SIGNIFICANCE: Davis designed this cottage for landscape painter Edward W. Nichols in 1858-59. It was meant, at first, to have masonry walls and a jiqsawn bargeboard as well as wooden cresting on the roofs of the porch and the bay windows. Davis himself modified the design, as he did for a number of similar Gothic Revival houses elsewhere. In 1866, the house was bought by James Miller McKim, prominent Philadelphia abolitionist and father of Charles Follen McKim (who, as a young architect in 1886, added a wing to the neighboring Levi P. Stone House). In a letter to her son written in 1866, Mrs. McKim decsribed the house as "rather fanciful for my taste."

Davis designed a handful of middle class Gothic Revival houses in the came cross-gabled mode, some more elaborate than others, but all falling into the same general vein. Among their number are the Delameter House in Rhinebeck, N.Y. (1843); the Rotch House, New Bedford, Mass. (1845); and the Wood House in Mt. Kisco, N.Y. (1846). The basic plan and design was soon absorbed into the vernacular building tradition as well. Most of the surviving houses of this type have been heavily altered or their settings have been despoiled.

Like the Gate Lodge, "Castlewood," and the Levi P. Stone House (not attributed to Davis), the Nichols Cottage illustrates the romatic attitude towards architecture and landscape design that characterized the Park's first phase of development.

DESCRIPTION *(Owner's address is West Orange unless noted otherwise.)

Construction Date: ca. 1857

Source of Date: see REFERENCES, over

Architect: Unknown (addition by Mckim Mead & White)

Builder:

Style: Gothic Revival

Form/Plan Type: Irregular massing

Number of Stories: 2½

Foundation: Ashlar sandstone

Exterior Wall Fabric: Ashlar sandstone

Fenestration: Trabeated and elliptically arched sash, some paired windows

Roof/Chimneys: Slate gables, hip & conical tower roof, 4 ashlar chimneys

Additional Architectural Description:

The house is entered through a vestibule set in a projecting bay that leads to a large transverse hall with principal stair and a mantel with attached bench forming a semi-inglenook arrangement. The stair, mantel and beamed ceiling are executed in light-colored oak. The floor, patterned with a central diamond motif, is composed of light and dark-stained boards in a manner similar to A.J. Davis' gallery floor at Lyndhurst (1865). The remaining rooms are far simpler, suggesting that the entry hall was remodeled when the rear wing was added in 1886-87 by McKim Mead & White. That wing, with corner tower overlooking the garden, was intended as an autonomous apartment communicating with the original house. It included a basement kitchen; stair hall, sitting room and dining room on the ground floor and a hall, two bedrooms and bath above. Photo #1204 depicts this wing (at the left) as seen from the garden.

SITING, BOUNDARY DESCRIPTION, AND RELATED STRUCTURES:

The Stone House stands across the road from the Nichols Cottage, designed by A.J. Davis at about the same time. Remains of a semi-formal garden are found behind the house.

SURROUNDING ENVIRONMENT: Urban ☐ Suburban ☑ Scattered Buildings ☐
Open Space ☐ Woodland ☑ Residential ☐ Agricultural ☐ Village ☐
Industrial ☐ Downtown Commerical ☐ Highway Commercial ☐ Other ☐

SIGNIFICANCE:

Together with the Nichols Cottage, "Castlewood," and the gate lodge, this is one of the few picturesque survivors of Llewellyn Park's first phase of development, when a special effort wasmade to relate architecture and romantic landscape design. The house is also notable as an example of McKim Mead & White's contextual approach to the problem of adding a new wing to an existing building.

SIGNIFICANCE:

Like Delano & Aldrich (cf. house #66), Albro & Lindeberg were known for their conservative and finely detailed houses for wealthy suburban clients, usually modeled on English precedents (like the Paul Moore estate, "Hollow Hill Farm," in Morris Township). Their work was often singled out for its individualistic and dramatic handling of roofs, a feature evident in this typically restrained but forceful design.

Architect: Alexander Jackson Davis
Builder:

Style: Picturesque
Form/Plan Type: Circular w/ 4 small rectangular wings

Number of Stories: 1½

Foundation: traprock

Exterior Wall Fabric: Uncoursed traprock

Fenestration: Diamond-paned casements & circular window

Roof/Chimneys: Conical w/ copper finial & exposed rafters

Additional Architectural Description: Early views show that the porch between the main circular portion and the stone "tower" or pillar was originally open. The wing to the west is much enlarged or entirely new construction. Like the small east bay, it is clad with logs instead of its original covering, which was probably vertical bark strips.

SITING, BOUNDARY DESCRIPTION, AND RELATED STRUCTURES: Across the road and several yards SW of the lodge is a portrait bust of Llewellyn Haskell by sculptor Launt Thompson. The bust, in bronze, is larger-than-life-size and was completed by Thompson in 1876 at a cost of $2500, commissioned as a memorial by subscription of the Park's Proprietors. The pedestal was designedby the firm of McKim Mead & White.

SURROUNDING ENVIRONMENT: Urban ☐ Suburban ☑ Scattered Buildings ☐

Industrial ☐ Downtown Commerical ☐ Highway Commercial ☐ Other ☐

SIGNIFICANCE: The gate lodge, modeled after "The Eyrie" that Davis had designed as a home for Llewellyn Haskell ca. 1853-54, is typical of the rustic picturesque structures that the architect felt were appropriate to the Park's wild surroundings. Even in its somewhat altered condition, it survives as one of the most important monuments of ante-bellum romantic architecture and landscape design and as a prime example of Davis' most picturesque response to the interaction between buildings and landscape.

SIGNIFICANCE:

Leland Roth notes that McKim Mead & White designed a house and carriage house for Henry B. Auchincloss in Llewellyn Park in 1882, built between 1883-84, at a cost of $50,035. The partner in charge is listed as Stanford White in the Bill Books. Henry Whittemore in his 1896 The Founders and Builders of the Oranges (Newark, L.J. Hardham), refers to this as the "Old English House." No pictures are known to exist. The vergeboards of the surviving carriage house are similar to those of the Stewart Hartshorn House designed by the firm 3 years later. The Hartshorn House also included a stickwork gable. If this motif had been used on the Auchincloss House, it might have inspired Whittemore to use the term "Old English." The carriage house is significant as a rare surviving example of the firms very early work.

SIGNIFICANCE:

A deft combination of picturesque massing and classicizing details, this house, like #123, owes its design to both the English vernacular tradition and the Arts and Crafts movements of both England and the United States. It is a good example of why Period Revival houses of this era are often hard to pigeonhole stylistically.

SIGNIFICANCE: In their general simplicity of detailing, large expanses of plain wall and stuccoed surfaces, a number of essentially "English Cottage"-derived houses in the Park betray Craftsman influence. This is a particularly large example, and its construction date accords well with the direct Craftsman influence of Gustav Stickley.

SIGNIFICANCE:

This house illustrates the thorny problem of how to assess the rare examples in the Park of recent architecture of quality. Because this building falls outside of the time frame established to evaluate the Park's significance, and because it is radically different in appearance from the buildings that constitute the district's stock of historic architecture, it must be classed as an intrusion. It seems an aesthetic injustice, however, to place it in the same class with the large number of banal and poor quality "Builder's Colonial" houses that are, and will remain, real intrusions, no matter what our subsequent historical perspective.

HISTORIC PRESERVATION SECTION, 109 WEST STATE STREET, TRENTON, NEW JERSEY 08608 (609) 292-2023

SITING, BOUNDARY DESCRIPTION, AND RELATED STRUCTURES:

Property fronts curve on Glen Avenue overlooking an open grassy area rare in the Park. Building is shielded from the road by tall pines and faces away from Glen Avenue to the West.

SURROUNDING ENVIRONMENT: Urban ☐ Suburban ☑ Scattered Buildings ☐
Open Space ☐ Woodland ☑ Residential ☐ Agricultural ☐ Village ☐
Industrial ☐ Downtown Commerical ☐ Highway Commercial ☐ Other ☐

SIGNIFICANCE:

This is one of the best survivors of the second phase of the Park's development when the size of estates increased from the relatively modest proportions of the Haskell-Davis era. The style of the carriage house is an amalgam of classically derived symmetry and vestigial neo-Gothicisms.
