

Comfort Station and Bathhouse, Bastrop State Park, Texas

Well-related architecturally to the stone cabin group it serves, this building houses toilet and bath facilities. The low-pitched roof of rugged texture, the heavy verge boards and the studiously unstudied rock masonry delight the critical eye. The window guards of stone, not too meticulously laid, give privacy, yet because of the great number of windows, light and ventilation are still provided in proper degree. The entrance doors to men's and women's sections are screened well by the informal rock walls, and the approaches are properly distant from each other.
