

San Juan Island

San Juan Island
National Historical Park
Washington

National Park Service
U.S. Department of the Interior

ENGLISH CAMP

AMERICAN CAMP

TWO NATIONS ON THE BRINK OF WAR NEGOTIATE THEIR WAY TO LASTING FRIENDSHIP

San Juan Island National Historical Park celebrates how individuals and nations can resolve disputes without resorting to violence. For it was here in the mid-1800s that Great Britain and the United States settled ownership of the island through peaceful arbitration.

Long before the Europeans arrived, the island's temperate climate, rich soil, timber, and marine resources attracted native peoples who for thousands of years netted salmon, hunted game, and gathered camas roots. These islands were first explored, charted, and named in the 1790s by Spain and Great Britain, and later by the United States. Each staked claims to the Oregon Country—the present states of Washington, Oregon, and Idaho, and parts of Wyoming, Montana, and British Columbia. Spain withdrew by 1800, and the British and the Americans agreed to a joint occupation of the region in 1818.

Although lucrative trade agreements and capital investments existed between the two nations, the Americans living in the Oregon Country considered the British presence an affront to their "manifest destiny." The British believed they had a legal right to lands guaranteed by earlier treaties, explorations, and the commercial activities of the Hudson's Bay Company (HBC).

Nevertheless, in June 1846 the Treaty of Oregon was signed in London. The boundary was set along the 49th parallel, from the Rocky Mountains to the middle of the "channel" separating Vancouver Island from the mainland, then south to the Strait of Juan de Fuca and west to the Pacific Ocean. But there are two channels: Haro Strait, nearest Vancouver Island, and Rosario Strait, nearer the mainland. The San Juan Islands lie between them. Both sides claimed the entire island group.

By 1853 the HBC established Belle Vue Sheep Farm on the island's southern shore, site of today's American Camp. The move was political, but the island's fertile soil and grazing lands also turned immediate profits. Word of good farm land spread quickly to the mainland and by the spring of 1859, at least 18 Americans had settled claims that the British believed were illegal.

An uneasy peace ended on June 15, 1859, when Lyman Cutlar, an American, shot an HBC pig rooting in his garden. When British authorities threatened Cutlar with arrest and his countrymen with eviction from the island, a delegation sought protection from Brig. Gen. William S. Harney, commander of the US Army's Department of Oregon. Harney ordered a company of infantry commanded by Capt. George E. Pickett (of later Civil War fame) to San Juan Island. Pickett landed his 64-man unit on July 27.

In response, British Gov. (and HBC chief factor) James Douglas dispatched Royal Navy Capt. Geoffrey Hornby and three warships with 62 total guns, 400 Royal Marines, and 15 Royal Engineers with orders to dislodge Pickett but avoid an armed clash. Pickett refused to budge and sought help from Harney, who sent Lt. Col. Silas Casey with reinforcements on August 10. Soon 461 soldiers occupied the island, erecting fortifications while Hornby watched from the bay. Fortunately, Rear Adm. R. Lambert Baynes, commander of the Royal Navy's Pacific Station, had by then returned from sea and ordered Hornby to stand fast. British naval policy dictated that he was only to fire if fired upon.

When word of the crisis reached Washington six weeks later, both governments agreed to send Lt. Gen. Winfield Scott, US Army commander, to contain the affair. He arrived by steamer in late October, and within a week he and Douglas agreed to reduce their forces to no more than 100 US soldiers and a single British warship.

On March 21, 1860, Royal Marines landed and set up "English Camp" on Garrison Bay, 13 miles northwest of American Camp. For the next 12 years, San Juan Island would remain under a peaceful joint military occupation.

In 1871 the boundary question was submitted for arbitration to Kaiser Wilhelm I of Germany, who a year later ruled that the islands belonged to the United States. The Royal Marines left in November 1872, the US troops two years later. Peace was affirmed on the 49th parallel, and San Juan Island would be long remembered for the "war" in which the only casualty was a pig.

Sir James Douglas
Governor, B.C.
Allowed superiors to assume that US actions threatened British settlers, not Hudson's Bay Company workers.

R. Lambert Baynes
Rear Admiral
Knighthood because the only casualty was a pig. "Tut, tut, no, no, the damn fools," he was reported to say.

Geoffrey P. Hornby
Captain
Wisely dodged Governor Douglas' orders to confront Pickett. Suggested instead a joint military occupation.

FLAG © ISTOCK PHOTO

MAP The San Juan Islands' interior waterways and narrow passages provided a covered anchorage for warships. A spyglass from the American Camp prairie could track every sortie from Victoria and Esquimalt harbors beyond. This was a significant advantage in an age when commerce and warfare in the region moved primarily by sea.

FLAG © STEPHEN DUMAYNE / ISTOCK PHOTO

JOINT OCCUPATION GAMES Royal Marines marched to American Camp to celebrate the Fourth of July, and the US troops sallied forth to English Camp to toast Queen Victoria's birthday. Picnicking, libations, horse racing, gunny sack races, and track-and-field events entertained troops usually separated by 13 miles between camps.

William S. Harney
Brigadier General
No Harney, no Pig War. Rightly moved to protect US settlers on disputed lands but turned hostile and escalated the events imprudently.

Winfield Scott
Lieutenant General
This sharp-minded lawyer's handling of the Pig War led to important future cooperation in US-British affairs.

George E. Pickett
Captain
Bluffed the British and worked first to please Harney, then Scott, but he was ignorant of the Treaty of Oregon.

FOURTH OF JULY: AMERICAN CAMP HOSTS THE ENGLISH CAMP
ILLUSTRATION © NPS / RICHARD SCHLECHT

The Island's Attractive Natural Bounty Shaped Its History from Earliest Times

Camas lily

Camas and buttercups (large photo) highlight one of this region's last remaining natural prairies.

An Orca whale breaching off the coast displays its massive body before hitting the water with a loud clap.

ALL PHOTOS NPS EXCEPT WHALE © ELIOT TESKEY AND EAGLES © RUSSELL ILLIG

The San Juan Islands host 125 bald eagle breeding pairs, the largest concentration in the lower 48 states. One pair nests near the American Camp visitor center.

The redoubt at American Camp offers a 360-degree view of Mounts Rainier and Baker (above), the Cascade and Olympic mountains, Strait of Juan de Fuca, Griffin Bay, and Vancouver Island.

At low tide, Grandmas Cove at American Camp may reveal sea stars, sea anemones, barnacles, limpets, mussels, chitons, and gleaming tangles of kelp.

NATURALIST ACTIVITIES San Juan Island National Historical Park offers a diverse landscape from seaside bluffs and evergreen forests to wetlands and stands of Garry oak. Many trails invite exploration. In spring purple camas and sprays of spring gold blanket the dramatic open prairie of American Camp. Throughout both English and American camps you will find abundant native wildflowers, like chocolate lilies, lupines, blue-eyed Marys, and hookedspur violets. Wildlife that you may see are Orca whales, Pacific harbor seals, river otters, Columbian blacktail deer, over 200 species of birds, and 32 of butterflies. Look for the rare island marble butterfly around the yellow field mustard plants. Guided tours include birding, prairie walks, and intertidal explorations.

THINGS TO KNOW English and American camps are day-use parks open daily, dawn to 11 pm. Visitor centers—year-round at American Camp, seasonal at English Camp—offer information, maps, books, gift shops, and exhibits. Self-guiding walk booklets are available at the trailheads. Park programs include guided tours, children's programs, and living history demonstrations and workshops. Picnic areas are available. Camping, hunting, and off-road travel (car, truck, motorcycle, or bicycle) are prohibited. Do not disturb or remove natural or cultural features. Pets must be under physical control at all times. Watch children near cliffs and shoreline. Don't swim—currents are strong and water frigid. For information and hours of operation, check the free park newspaper at visitor centers or visit www.nps.gov/sajh.

ENGLISH CAMP is on tranquil Garrison Bay, an ancient home of the Coast Salish people. At water's edge is a shell midden reported to have been 900 feet long and 350 feet wide. A self-guiding trail traces the Royal Marine era with its historic parade ground, barracks, blockhouse, commissary, and a formal garden patterned after the original one planted in 1867 for a captain's homesick wife. In the visitor center an audiovisual program describes the US-British boundary dispute and the peaceful joint occupation. Hike along the bay, then through forest up to the summit of 650-foot Young Hill for panoramas of Vancouver Island, the Olympic Mountains, and Haro Strait. The Mitchell Hill trail network also offers forest walks. In spring, look for wildflowers like fawn lilies and shooting stars.

AMERICAN CAMP dates from 1859, but native peoples harvested camas bulbs here over 2,500 years ago. The visitor center houses American Indian artifacts that represent the daily life of an ancient culture—harpoon points and shell pendants—as well as buttons, bottles, and spectacles from the 1800s. There are many trails. Relive the Pig War on a self-guiding history walk or see the original officers' and laundress quarters. Hike the seaside bluffs, up Mount Finlayson, or down to the lagoons with views of Griffin Bay, where in 1859 the schooner Harney ran aground. Or stroll along South Beach, where the steamer Julia unloaded naval guns from the USS Massachusetts. As you walk, listen for the soft spouting of an Orca whale and watch for river otters scurrying down the bluffs to the beach.

MORE INFORMATION
San Juan Island
National Historical Park
P.O. Box 429
Friday Harbor, WA 98250
360-378-2240
www.nps.gov/sajh

For firearms regulations check the park website or ask at a visitor center.
Service animals are welcome.

The park staff works to restore native grasses and wildflowers on the American Camp prairie by removing invasive species, planting native vegetation, and doing controlled burning.

Prescribed fire is designed to mimic historic fire patterns and prevent invasion of the prairie by non-prairie plants.

San Juan Island National Historical Park is one of over 390 parks in the National Park System. To learn more about parks and National Park Service programs in America's communities visit www.nps.gov.

